A Story Good Enough to Follow Thanksgiving-Day.

RIGOLOT'S ORDEALS, You were told some weeks ago how my French friend Blaise Rigolot became enamored of the dowry of Miss Ruth Cum-leigh, and succeeded in intruding himself upon her attention. This week he and I have been staying at Cumleigh Lodge, in Surry, to honor the pheasant preserves; but we have been doing something else besides shooting thanks to the ingenious spirit of

You recollect being informed that Mr. Cumleigh had fallen into bad odor among society, owing to Miss Ruth's eccentric proceedings. Having a romantic mania for testing the personal courage of her adorers, this young lady had played pranks upon a certain well connected gentleman-notably a guardsman or two-and these pranks had young city gentleman named Tuttle, who redounded more to Miss Ruth's perspica- had been sworn into the conspiracy, and mycity than to the glorification of her victims. To revenge themselves, the well-connected gentlemen, who had been made to the report that Mr. Cumleigh was dis- to be baulked of it. Well, it was good fun, show the white feather, had spread gracefully bad-a person of whose antecedents nothing was known, and must have made his fortune by modes of which no right-thinking mind could approve. As for me, I only half believed this; but having a great opinion of myself, like the rest of you, I hesitated to accept Mr. Cumleigh's invitation, and it was only at the instant supplication of Rigolot that I at length condescended to accompany him. When we arrived, Miss Ruth thanked me with a demure little bow, for the honor I was doing her father's roof, and hoped that I should not find the hospitality of it too humble.

This was nonsense, for a less humble place could not be found for advertising. Cumleigh Lodge is rich, luxurious, and yet tasteful; for those who, knowing little of the houses of city plutocrats, prate of the ostentatious vulgarity of these abodes, forget that men like Mr.-Cumleigh seldom consult their own tastes in the matter of furniture, but appeal to artistic upholsterers. Before I had rels, however, it is fair to mention that Tutspent a clock-round at the Lodge I could not the did not wait for any barrels after the help wishing that some of the aristocracy, among whom my acquaintances chiefly lieas I think I was good enough to explain to long onto the flower-bed, twenty feet below, you before-would take a leaf out of a cityman's book. The only thing to complain of was that among the other guests invited were a trifle too many fellow city-men strongly perfumed with gold; but, after all, gold is a good perfume.

The other morning, then, after a satisfying breakfast of game pies, we observed that the sky was weeping, and as sport was difficult under the circumstances, I strolled in the billiard-room and began knocking the balls about, waiting for Rigolot to join me. I had scarcely been so engaged a minute when Ruth Cumleigh glided in with a gravity of purpose on her pretty face. She was adorably fresh, dressed in a buff costume, or ecru linen, with a velvet band and large medallon round her neck, velvet bracelets round her wrists, and a scarlet rose stuck, as by the merest accident, in her girdle. Laying her finger on her lips she motioned to me to follow her into the conservatory adjoining the billiard-100m, and there, when I had let fall the door curtain, she said: "Mr. Trefoil."

"Miss Cumleigh,"

"Your French friend is making violent love to me." "I do not wonder at it."

"It's a matter of taste; but I should be careful before marrying a Frenchman." "An authentic Viscount, I believe."

O, foreign Viscounts! And, have no faith in the courage of these French men. They boast too much, and I would not give a pin for a man who boasted and had no courage. He would be sure to tyrannize and make one wretched and asbamed of him. What is your opinion of Monsieur Rigolot?" "Try him."

"That is what I mean to do if you will help me. There is a ghost who is said to baunt a church-yard near here. Do you think Monsieur Rigolot is afraid of ghosts?' "I have little taste for them myself, but a Frenchman may be above such prejudice." "And do you think that Monsieur Rigolot would like to be awoke at night by two armed burglars pointing revolvers in his face?" asked Miss Ruth, fixing her large eyes on me. "I can only answer for myself, and confess that a night so disturbed would be most disagreeably noted in my memory" "Well, I think that will do then," said the pleasant young lady gravely; "and to-morrow, if he gets through the two trials creditably, I will tell him that papa has received a telegram saying that his fortune is in jeopardy. I shall see then whether your friend cares for me or my money."

I laughed, she laughed, and between us we agreed to submit Rigolot to as uncomfortable a series of ordeals as I have ever heard devised. So that evening at dinner, just as the soup was being removed, and before any of the guests had time to draw an artificial courage from wine, Ruth Cumleigh remarked quietly: "Papa, it's to-night the ghost pays a yearly visit to Gravehill church-"My dear child, how can you say such foolish things?"

"Mademoiselle believes in ghosts, zen? inquired Rigolot, displaying his white teeth on the other side of the table. "In undoubted ghosts, Monsieur Rigolot, and this one has frightened several people to death. I'm sure it makes one's flesh creep to think of it. Do you not believe in ghosts?" kigolot's handsome face at once became serious. "Zere are more zings in Heaven and earth zan we dream of, as your Shakspeare says, Mademoiselle; I cannot deny vat I know nozing about; but I care not for ghosts; I mock myself of zem; for what can zey do to me."

"The answer of a sensible and brave man, Mossheer Rigolot," exclaimed Mr. Cumleigh, with approval, and the other city men, their wives and mobile incumbrances, concurred. But Ruth ejaculated, smiling, as if skeptical, "Well, should you dare to go and stand in Gravehill church-yard alone at midnight, Mossheer Rigolot?"

My friend made one of his inimitable French bows, and asked whether Miss Ruth would favor him with her company; but she answered that the test of pococurantism in these cases consists in being quite solitary, Accordingly it was understood that the Frenchman should set out for Gravebill unattended at half-past 11; and I am bound to own that the prospect of this excursion did not interfere in the least with Rigolot's good humor or appetite. He ate, chatted, and joked as usual, took rather less wine than his wont, and at the appointed time, notwithstanding the dissussions of Mr. Cumleigh, who begged him not to consider the whims of a spoilt caild, he donned his hat and overcoat and sallied forth. It was especially noticed that he did not take a stick or umbrella.

As soon as he was gone, Ruth hastened to her room, and in ten minutes reappeared, having changed her dress and put on a thick shawl and bonnet. I was in waiting to give her my arm, and together we walked out, going at a fast pace to reach the church-yard before midnight.

It was about five minutes to t welve when we arrived, and, looking through a crevice in the low wall that surrounded the churchyard, we perceived the Frenchman sitting unconcernedly upon a tombstone. There was no rain, the moon was beaming, and tall, very funereal, shadows were cast into the depths of the buttresses, and on one side of the spire, which rose straight and high in the clear air, Rigolot's face stood full in the moonlight, and we could see that indifference was perfect. Humming a tune, he drew a cigar-case from his pocket, and struck a fusee

"Manly, but profane," whispered Ruth, clinging to my arm.

that this apperition was nothing but a gardener's boy, who was a great ally of Ruth in these Buventures, and who played his part by the customary means of a sheet and a pole with phosphorized mangelwurzel at the top. This gardener's boy then advanced; but the instant he began to be seen stalking among the tombs, Rigolot raised a bright, joyous laugh-without a quaver in itjumped from his grave, and walked to meet him. The ghost was not unprepared for this move, and receded; Rigolot followed. The ghost, thoroughly mystified, broke ground; then, seeing the Frenchman continue to approach, turned tail and ran. Hercupon Rigolot's merry voice rang out in reiterated peals, and he called out, with wonderful intrepidity and archness: "Come, don't be afraid of me, my good ghost. I am only a man. Accept a ciga-

Ruth was abashed as we made our way home. There was no doubt Rigolot had got the best of the first bout, and I suggested the propriety of dispensing him from the burglar ordeal. But the arrangements had already been made. The gardener's boy, a self had all rehearsed for climbing into Rigolot's balcony with crape masks on our faces; and both Ruth and Tuttle anticipated too much good fun from this performance after all, especially for Tuttle. I pass over the congratulations which Rigolot received on his return from the ghost expedition, and come at once to the small hour of 3 in the morning, when the gardener, Tuttle, and I, found ourselves climbing a ladder under Rigolot's balcony, each with a horse-pistol in his hand. Tuttle led the way, and being provided with a glazier's instrument for cutting glass, coolly removed a pane, passed his hand through the aperture, opened the wicdow, and walked in. He had some difficulty in suppressing his grins, but he did not grin

I have never heard for certain what actually ensued; but it seems that Rigolot was awoke by the noise, faint as it was, and seeing a burglar, (there was a night-light on the chimney-place,) leaped out of bed, flew to a drawer, and extracted a revolver, thence let fly the whole six barrels at Tuttle without a word of warning. In saying six barfirst; for in one bound he was on the balcony, and in a second he had dropped headwithout so much as touching the ladder. The gardener and I followed in a state of emotion which you may be left to imagine; for we heard the bullets crashing with fearful bangs through one pane after another. But possibly Rigolot did not really aim at any of us; for it was noticed afterward that all the bullets went through the upper panes.

Well, Rigolot triumphed in two trials, but the worst was set him just before luncheon that day. All the morning there had been panie-stricken talk among the city-men about the presumed burglary of the night, and Rigolot had given his version of that startling episode to a couple of policemen who were sent for from the village. He was calm in his account, and strictly modest. In fact, his attitude was such as would bave given any ordinary young lady the highest opinion of him. And yet, toward 1 o'clock Ruth Cumleigh, her face sparkling with mischief, suddenly passed through the room where I was, and, beckoning to me with her tinger,

"Just stand behind the door, Mr. Trefoil and you'll see." Rigolot was scated, reading. He rose and abruptly exclaimed : "What is the matter, Mademoiselle? You are crying." "O, never mind me, Monsieur Rigolot; it's only for papa I care; he has just refived a letter announcing his ruin "Good beavens! Ruined!"

"Yes, complete ruin. It seems he will not be able to save a shilling. O, dear! to think he should suffer like this!" "Ruined!" exclaimed Rigolot with an extraordinary outburst of feeling. "Ab, Mademoiselle, forgive me for saying a hard zing, but I am half glad of this. Yes; I had long loved you, but you were rich, and I feared my attentions might be misjudged. But now zat I am richer zan you, say, my beautiful, darling Ruth, you will be mine! And hereon I, behind the door, heard something not unlike kisses, protests, then
